The 2017 Young Journalist Training Camp for the Wuhan Open was held at the Optics Valley International Tennis Center from July 21 to 23. Co-organized by the Wuhan Open's organizing committee and the Chucai Competition Committee, the aim of the camp is to popularize tennis and to build a social practice platform for children.

Courses of the 2017 Young Journalist Training Camp

The activity started on June 1 of this year, and has attracted more than 1,000 students from local primary and middle schools. After a one-month selection process, 150 students got the chance to take part in the training camp.

During the three days, students studied five courses, and were given tests at the end of each class. In these courses, the students were given an introduction to the Wuhan Open. They were also taught how to become qualified reporters skilled in both writing and photography. On the last day, students were given permission to play tennis in the Wuhan Open's 15,000-seat stadium.

The Wuhan Open's organizing committee will select 100 young reporters and grant them the title of Young Journalist of the Wuhan Open. The top ten students will each have a press pass, and they will be allowed to conduct interviews during the Wuhan Open this September. Candidates will be chosen based on their class participation, assignments, and athletic ability. The list of nominees will be announced in early August.
